Big Idea: First Nations have a rich history. Their relationship with the land has continued to evolve since contact with Europeans. Despite attempts to assimilate, and diminish their culture, the Indigenous people in this area known as Alberta have helped to shape the provinces diverse identity over time.

References
The Canadian Encyclopedia
http://www.thecanadianencyclopedia.ca
First Nations in Alberta
https://www.aadnc-aandc.gc.ca/eng/1100100020670/1100100020675
Essential Terminology

A Long History
First Nations history in Alberta dates back at least 11,000 years and approximately 500 generations. The Milk River that runs through Writing-On-Stone Provincial Park in Alberta contains the largest concentration of First Nation petroglyphs (rock carvings) and pictographs (rock paintings) on the great plains of North America. Evidence like the rock carvings and a 10,000 year old spearhead found in Athabasca prove a lengthy and well established way of life for the First Nations in Alberta.

First Nation Life Before the Arrival of Europeans
Prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America, the land provided the First Nations with everything they required for their mental, physical, spiritual and emotional well being. Everything in nature was seen as living; therefore, First Nations people respected and took care of the land around them. The land took care of the First Nations by continually growing herbs and plants for healing and providing the wildlife they needed to survive. First Nations people had established independent and organized societies across the continent prior to contact with Europeans. Many pre-contact First Nations thrived on a maternal system that placed women in leadership roles and were involved in much of the decision making. Oral storytelling is how First Nations knowledge and history was preserved and shared from generation to generation.

Pre-Contact Alberta
The First Nations in Alberta prior to expansion included the Siksika (Blackfoot), Kainaj (Blood), Piikuni (Peigan) and Gros Ventre (now in Montana). Other groups, including the Kootenay and the Crow, made expeditions into the land to hunt bison and go to war. The Tsuu T’ina, a branch of the Beaver, occupied central and northern parts of the land, while the north was used by the Slavey.

Acknowledgement:
This guide was developed by the Alberta Regional Professional Development Consortium to support implementation. It is freely provided in support of improved teaching and learning under the following Creative Commons license.

CC BY NC SA
Early Contact with First Nations

Some speculate that men from England reached Newfoundland as early as the 1480s, predating Columbus’s voyage of 1492. The only hard evidence points to John Cabot’s English expedition of 1497 as the first known voyage to mainland North America in the new era of overseas discovery. A French explorer named Jacques Cartier’s arrival was in 1534. He made three voyages to Canada in eight years. On his first voyage he entered and explored the Gulf of St Lawrence. On his second, he followed the St Lawrence to the Iroquoian townships of Stadacona (Québec) and Hochelaga (Montréal). The Iroquois in this area explained that the river stretched three months’ travel to the west. For the first time, Europeans were given some idea of the vastness of the country. Cartier did not find the "great quantity of gold, and other precious things" mentioned in his instructions, he did locate the gulf's abundant fisheries and the mainland’s furs, tempting Europe’s commercial interests.

Over the next three centuries the French, the British, and other European settlers would continue to prosper from the fisheries and the fur trade in the east. Through many wars and battles involving land and establishing colonies, the settlers and explorers gradually started to move further west.

Westward Expansion

Canada West grew rapidly because of steady immigration from England, Scotland, Ireland and the United States. Many newcomers cleared the forests, cut lumber and worked the rich farmland. Increasing demands for land forced people to look further to the west for settlement.

With the fur trade in decline, the British government and leaders in British North America became interested in the agricultural potential of the prairies. In 1867, the Dominion of Canada was created. In 1870, Canada purchased Rupert's Land and the North-West Company from the HBC, and labelled the entire western and Arctic region the Northwest Territories. In 1874, Canada began asserting its presence in what would become Alberta, sending the North West Mounted Police across the prairies to present-day Lethbridge to establish Fort Macleod. In 1875, the Mounties also built forts in present-day Calgary and Edmonton and the Canadian Pacific Railway reached Calgary in 1883.
Numbered Treaties
The Numbered Treaties were a series of 11 treaties made between the Canadian government and Indigenous peoples from 1871 to 1921. The government thought the treaties would help to assimilate Indigenous peoples into white, colonial society and culture. The First Nations viewed the treaties as a way to negotiate the sharing of their traditional territories. Treaty making was so important that opening and closing ceremonies were part of the process and people travelled long distances to arrive at the negotiation locations to witness the event. In exchange for their traditional territory, government negotiators made various promises to Indigenous peoples including special rights to lands, the distribution of cash payments, hunting and fishing tools and farming supplies. These terms of agreement vary by treaty and are controversial and contested. Treaties still have ongoing legal and socioeconomic impacts on Indigenous communities. Alberta Treaties 6, 7 and 8 were signed between 1876-1899. For more information see Conversation Guide Alberta Treaties 6,7,8.

(Left): numbered treaties in the prairies.

Confederation and First Nation People in Alberta
Prime Minister Wilfrid Laurier met with other government officials and drew up a bill to unify the districts of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Assiniboia, and Athabasca. After further considerations, it was decided that the proposed province would be too big to unify.

This area was then split into Alberta and Saskatchewan and Canada adopted the Alberta Act on 1 September 1905. The creation of Alberta did not greatly change the lifestyle for the First Nations in the new province. First Nations were still the responsibility of the federal government. The Constitution of 1867 made the federal government responsible for “Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians.” The Indian Act of 1876 also made “Indians” wards of the federal government. The original inhabitants of Alberta were not asked to participate in politics and were left out of much of the political negotiations dealing with land or laws. First Nations people were finally allowed to vote in provincial elections in 1969.
Assimilation Policies

The signing of the treaties and the implementation of the Indian Act were not the first attempts to assimilate First Nation people into white society. The government started to impose harsh restrictions on First Nations people long before the 1800s. Each policy and written law that was created was essential to assimilating First Nations into society. Language, land use, educational practice, traditional ceremonies, and spiritual practices were all directly affected by the policies throughout the years. Here are a few examples.

1847- Report on Native Education proposed that the separation of children from their parents would be the best way to achieve assimilation. In this report, Egerton Ryerson, Superintendent for Education recommended that First Nations education should focused on religious instruction and agricultural training.

1857- The Gradual Civilization Act was part of a the government’s efforts to use policy to assimilate Indigenous peoples to the economic and social customs of European settler society.

1876: The Indian Act gives the Department of Indian Affairs authority to create policy in regard to “Indian matters” by determining status, managing land, setting up elected band councils as governing bodies on reserves and helping to “civilize” the people. Indian Agents were appointed to assert policy on reserves including the implementation of the pass system in 1885. First Nations people living on a reserve had to carry a pass, approved by the agent, that stated their reason for being off the reserve and how long they would be gone.

1879: The Davin Report Sir John A Macdonald sent Nicholas Flood Davin to meet with U.S officials to discuss their strategy on the education for First Nations children. He made recommendations on how the American “boarding school” model could be implemented in Canada to assimilate First Nations children. This was the birth of most Residential schools in Canada.

1892-1996: Residential Schools operated as late as 1996. Residential schools eventually became compulsory and attendance was strictly enforced. In the early years, children were involuntarily taken from their families and did not return until the summer months. Children were as young as five were sent and were not free from the system until they were in their teenage years. Children were forced to abandon their languages, their ceremonies, their family life and their traditional way of living. Life at residential schools was difficult with most children later disclosing their horrific encounters at one of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission’s seven national events across Canada. Alberta had the most Residential Schools in Alberta.

1969: The “White Paper” is proposed by Prime Minister P. Trudeau to dismantle the Indian Act, ending the special legal relationship between Aboriginal People and Canada and moves responsibility for Aboriginal issues to the provinces. This was met with strong opposition from the First Nations across the provinces who thought the federal government was absolving itself of historical promises and responsibilities. In response, Trudeau withdrew the White Paper in 1970 and angrily stated: “We’ll keep them in the ghetto as long as they want.”
Contemporary Indigenous Alberta

Today there are 46 First Nations within Alberta. The most commonly spoken First Nations languages are Kainai (Blackfoot); Cree; Chipewyan; Dene; Sarcee; and Stoney (Nakoda Sioux).

There are three treaty areas (6, 7 & 8) in Alberta with treaty 4 covering a small portion of southeastern Alberta. For more information on treaties see Conversation Guide Treaties 6, 7, 8. There are eight formal Métis settlements in Alberta. For more detailed information see Conversation Guide Métis in Alberta Part 1 & 2.

First Nation Communities in Alberta
Questions for Reflection and Discussion

Question: After reading this Conversation Guide, what resonated with you? Perhaps it was something that surprised you, or something you were unaware of? Perhaps is was something that you agree or disagree with? Take turns sharing your thoughts and building on each others' ideas.

Indigenous Communities in Alberta
Study the map on the previous page.

Question: Why do you suppose there are more communities in northern Alberta than in the south? Which communities are closest to where you live? Does this have any implications on education in your town or city?

Places for Indigenous Knowledge
There are 26 publicly funded post-secondary institutions in Alberta. These institutions receive several types of funding from Advanced Education and are governed by the Post-Secondary Learning Act. Alberta has 5 First Nations Colleges/Universities across the province that provide the same educational experiences as other institutions while also fostering First Nations culture and traditions.

Question: Why would having First Nations institutions be important to Indigenous people in Alberta? What does this say about resiliency after residential schools?

For More Information

Walking Together: First Nations, Métis, and Inuit Perspectives in Curriculum.
http://www.learnalberta.ca/content/aswt/

Our Words our Way
https://education.alberta.ca/media/563982/our-words-our-ways.pdf

Our Way is a Valid Way

Education is Our Buffalo

First Nations Communities in Alberta
http://report.hcom.ca/people/first-nations-communities-alberta/